Over the past years, the development of scientific simulation methodology for constructing the ground-state atomic structure of polymers and long-chain hydrocarbons has received increasing attentions. In this review, an update on simulation studies of the polymer and long-chain hydrocarbon systems will be presented, concentrating especially on simulations on the structure of the aliphatic backbones, conformational flexibility, and the effect of the backbone structure on chemical reactivity.

These topics include the introduction of early results in these areas, discussion of possible biological and synthetic implications, and a conclusion. Platelet-endothelial cell interaction and the possible relevance to atherogenesis. Platelets play an important role in haemostasis and hemostasis; in addition they have a host of other functions including the formation of thrombi and the recruitment of leukocytes to sites of vascular injury.
